Choosing a husbandVon Helen HancoxThis book looks like 90% of the other Historical Romances I've seen recently - a partially-clad woman in a clinch with a partially-clad chap. The embossed lettering spells out yet another irritatingly-cheesy title. More of the same. Fortunately the story had a little more to recommend it. Our heroine, Dorothea Ellingham, is a bit more interesting than most, although rather direct and abrupt in some of her conversation. Her behaviour also is a bit unlikely for the Regency period, or at least that she was able to get away with kissing various gentlemen without getting an appalling reputation. Our hero is called Carter Grayson. I could go off on a tangent here about the weird names that abound in American-authored books, with excessive use of Grayson in first names and last names, but I'll leave that topic alone except to say who on earth would give their son, a marquess and heir to a dukedom, the name 'Carter' which represents someone who makes their living in a less than aristocratic way. It just seems wrong to me! Once I managed to ignore the name I found myself following a story where our two main characters each have their own needs (Dorothea to find a man she can marry who will fire her blood with his kiss, Carter to find a wife who isn't one of the appalling simpering girls his father seems to want to select for him). Of course Dorothea and Carter find a match in each other, but they may both find that marriage and passion aren't enough for true happiness - they may need love. There was a side plot in this story about Major Roddington, a military hero who the reader knows has been involved in plotting some dodgy stuff. However he could hardly be considered a proper 'baddie' and in fact I found the aspects of the plot involving Roddy to be a bit of a stretch in terms of credibility. All in all this was another fairly bland and unmemorable romance - like 90% of the others that look like this on the bookshelf.
