KundenrezensionenHilfreichste Kundenrezensionen0 von 0 Kunden fanden die folgende Rezension hilfreich. good idea - strange writingVon J. HeynertThis story is written as a letter to the wife of the person who was transported back in time ... until you get a few section in third person, supposedly to give you a different perspective. I do not like when writers switch between first person and third person, but it would be ok, if it's done in regular intervals or with good reasons. here it just pops up and doesn't really serve any purpose as it doesn't seem to reveal anything we don't already know from the original narrator. also the main narrator writes this down for his wife, but in certain section you noticed that the author forgot about this concept. He writes about feelings for another woman without any consideration for the wife. very annoying.

Kurzbeschreibung During the booming 1920s Dianne Dameron was the privileged daughter of a real estate heiress and a dynamic builder of homes for the wealthy. But in 1935 her mother's fortune is gone while her warehouses stand empty, and the small house Dianne's father is building is his last contract. At the age of 25 and with no prospects, Dianne is facing the reality of a long and lonely spinsterhood in the shadows of her parents' decaying mansion until an intense stranger with freshly shined shoes and polished manners begs her father for work; any work. Dianne finds herself irresistibly drawn to this unsuitable man. Not only because he is able to see the untapped potential in the struggling construction company and the vacant warehouses, but also in Dianne herself.
