honourable captor (if 'honourable' and 'kidnapper' can be part of the same character!). Constance Cameron is a young American woman who wants to run away from the boarding school in Edinburgh in which she has been placed by her two sister, heroines of previous books by this author. As Constance finally escapes the school she is kidnapped by a Scottish man, Gordon Lachlan, the leader of a rebellion. Constance is unlike most women that Gordon has previously met, being spirited and resourceful. She tries to escape him at all opportunities as she wants to sail back to America on a ship that leaves Edinburgh in four days. However once Constance is taken to Gordon's camp her attitude seems to change remarkably quickly - she agrees to join their rebellion and helps to organise the camp. There's a healthy dose of unrealism here where one short speech by Constance is enough to change the entire mood of the camp. Constance also facilitates the breaking down of barriers between Gordon and his half-sister, Fiona, who was the victim of an attack by English soldiers and who partly blames Gordon. Constance is meant to be exchanged for the Sword of the MacKenna, a symbol for the rebellion. Of course, when the time comes for the sword to be exchanged, Gordon isn't so sure that it's an easy trade. With a price on his head and his people relying on him for their future, what chance does he have with Constance? This book was a reasonable enough read with a variety of characters and some local colour. The historicity and geography go a little awry occasionally and Gordon's ability to give up his long-held rebellion plans seem a little hasty but it didn't ever become boring and Constance was a worthy heroine. The plot really was rather simple, however, with little depth to the characters apart from Fiona. This is the fourth in a series and although it isn't necessary to have read the previous books it might help to explain some of the other characters' behaviour if the reader is already familiar with them. Synopsis Gordon Lachlan, Laird MacKenna, has one duty and that is to his people. Beaten down by the English, there is only one way he can regain his honor and his people's pride - recover the Sword of the MacKenna from his former hostage, the Duke of Colster. Desperate, Gordon plans to kidnap the duke's sister-in-law and use the sword as her ransom. But in the young Constance, Gordon finds more than he can handle. Sent to Madame Lavalier's Academy for Young Women for the sole purpose of polishing her 'rough' edges and making her attractive to a duke, Constance Cameron is not having a good time. All she wants is to return home and relish her freedom. So when Gordon Lachlan shows up at her window to kidnap her, Constance is more than happy to go with him. Of course, the two don't see eye to eye on how the 'kidnapping' should be carried out, but their growing attraction for each other may make these two potential enemies closer than ever.
